My wife and I met Debbi and Jean-Paul at a neighborhood bistro over coffee and began our adventure into cheese. On our personal tour, we visited a local cheese shop and learned to how to determine the age of the cheeses displayed. The "affineur" guided us to several of his basement caves to observe different cheeses and aging techniques. Next, we visited a small but well known artisan's shop. Throughout our tour, Debbi and Jean-Paul provided background information and were attentive to our questions. We bought a great variety of cheese to enjoy later at Debbi's apartment. This was especially fun because, although we have rented apartments and houses, we have rarely received an invitation to socialize with the "natives" in their homes. We had a relaxing luncheon with our hosts with our cheese and a salad, and a variety of breads and wines to accentuate them. We'd love to do this again, there's so much more cheese yet to sample.

This was a wonderful introduction to...cheese: where and how to buy it, and, of course, how to eat it. (You thought you knew!). When you set off for France, you of course had visions of fromage dancing in your head...but once you set foot on French territory, did you really know the first thing about how to deal with cheese beyond buying a few slices of your old favorites and eating them? Once Debbi and Jean-Paul show you a couple of Paris' fromageries, you'll know SO much more. Not only does this personal couple welcome you into their home and make you feel like honored guests, but by the end of the cheese adventure, you feel as if you really, really know how to choose and eat cheese...I promise you, you'll be ready to venture into a fromagerie on your own (even if you don't really speak French) and will feel confident that your choices will be good ones. You'll also know how to ask for the fromagers for help. Don't miss this if you have any interest in delving into true French eating. Wonderful.
